

Every kid should really matter to someone.

Children and young people seek attention. Child and Youth Care workers give it to them. It is not necessarily that they want it, more that they need it. Paying attention is a constant activity at both the individual and group level. Every worker knows to pay special attention to one child or youth in particular to give them an appreciation of being very important to one adult. At the core of Child and Youth Care work and the center of most worker's experience is the relationship with a youth at risk. Through relationship real differences are made every day.
